

POLS-246: Seminar in Science and Technology Policy

Examination of the public policy issues that have deep connections to science and technology and its expertise. It examines environmental, energy, and economic policy in the United States and their local, state, national and global implications. Topics covered may include air and water policy, energy production and regulation, STEM education and labor markets, trade, innovation, intellectual property, federal research & development.

Credits: 3

Program: Political Science